Hany Rashed and Iman Hasbani

October 2013

Egyptian contemporary visual artist Hany Rashed is exhibiting a collection of artwork produced in the aftermath of the January 25 revolution. As the events of the uprising unfolded, Rashed resided and worked in Cairo, at times too overwhelmed with its turbulence to be able to paint it. This show is composed of two parts; the first is a series of works inspired by clashes in downtown Cairo between protesters and security forces in the winter of 2011. The canvases feature street signs and monuments from downtown Cairo covered in a white haze-a representation of the tear gas used profusely during the clashes. The rest of Rashed's collection features works painted from the initial 18 days of the revolution, which ultimately toppled Hosni Mubarak's regime until the interim military rule in June 2012. These paintings illustrate, for example, the diverse protesters in Tahrir Square and the symbols that have become associated with the uprising. This exhibition captures Hany Rashed's autobiographical artistic manifestations; unable to escape a context of socio-political transformation the artist's work narrates Egypt's recent history.
